The basis of KORE came from a simple question: How could Bauhaus principles suit environments today? The answer, of course, goes back to the Bauhaus approach.

Embracing a range of artistic and technical disciplines, Bauhaus attempted to make good design affordable for all. In doing so, industrial material like steel tubes and profiles became materials of choice. Design took on timeless shapes like circles and squares. Human needs were essential and simplicity was celebrated over complexity.

With Bauhaus as inspiration, KORE was designed by Swiss architect Daniel Korb as a table he envisioned for working and living—an approach that ended up as a mere starting point. During the design process, KORE evolved into a full program, complete with elements for privacy, media integration, and solutions for learning and training.

Daniel’s work has been celebrated for being simple, intuitive, and made for human needs. In the context of design for interior environments, he focuses on creating the ideal solution for the end user—products that function as beautifully as they look.
